The "Yes" IDA platform allows for different search fields, ordered sets (as in many standardized tests), automatic scoring, and the ability to administer multiple forms concurrently. English Language Learners ADA works very well with students with limited English language proficiency (LEP). Indeed, even students with a broad range of LEP can find it efficient and accurate. Predictive Input Technology and Computer-Adaptive Testing All kinds of input technologies are available to support the rapid administration of ADA, including clickers, handheld devices, touchscreen interfaces, etc. In these types of administration, the tests are customized to the answers that are provided by the student. This approach makes ADA very valuable in today's technology-driven, globalization driven world. For example, some states have made ADA available on a number of different devices, including laptops, tablets, and smartphones. Testing

Program Integrity ADA has a reputation for protecting program integrity. Some people refer to this as "attempted cheating" because those who take ADA would be guilty of a crime if they were to attempt to alter a test on their computer. This is a risk that state testing organizations have decided is very low, and that they can live with. Since most states have legislation to prevent fraudulent altering of tests, ADA administrators typically employ good practices to avoid cheating. For example, administrators are trained to enter their data from the test form into a special software program. This software locks the data files such that anyone cannot see them. The file names are very long and very difficult to forge, and so the data are hard to find. The actual student data are never exposed, and never contain identifying information.
